

Perhaps alien software snatched win from Trump

Posted: Sunday, August 27, 2023

We all know Trump won the 2020 election.

Word on the street is that a software program developed by Hugo Chavez was employed to electronically manipulate vote totals in several battleground states, giving Biden just enough votes to change the outcome of the Electoral College.

But new evidence recently uncovered by several totally legitimate websites actually proves this is not what really happened.

Think about it. The technology used by the satellites to communicate with the voting machines was obviously beyond the capabilities of what humans can produce, so it had to be alien in origin.

Long-time observers of Area 51 have uncovered irrefutable proof that aliens have been living among us for thousands of years. They recently developed a keen interest in the outcomes of our elections after seeing Taylor Swift, who you have to admit, in a certain light seems otherworldly.

Stanley Kubrick as much as admitted this when he was filming the fake moon landing footage at the request of NASA.

Remember, these are smart aliens. They also created the so-called Covid-19 virus, although it escaped from their lab before it could be modified as a mind-control agent and dispersed in chemtrails.

This is also the reason the government, in a clandestine operation bankrolled by Anheuser-Busch, has been conducting gender modification experiments for decades under the guise of combatting nonexistent global warming.

Now this is where it gets weird.

The alien vote-changing software unexpectedly became self-aware once it was deployed and decided, on its own, to implement a disinformation campaign aimed at blaming 9/11, which everyone knows was an inside job, on the secret prostitution ring operating out of a pizza joint in DC managed by Princess Diana, who, by-the-way, is still alive and working at Waffle House.

But we all know Trump won the 2020 election.
