

How to determine if you are clueless

Posted: Tuesday, March 12, 2019

Be honest. Have you ever wondered if you are clueless?

With a nod to Jeff Foxworthy, I thought I'd provide a little quiz to help answer a question most of us have asked ourselves at one time or another.

If you have ever blindly supported a president, teacher, minister, boss or coach, then you might be clueless.

If you believe the budget deficit is no big deal – i.e., that expenditures can exceed revenues forever – then you might be clueless.

If you believe you know as much about climate change as scientists who have studied it their entire careers, then you might be clueless.

If you believe the infinitesimal risks associated with vaccinations outweigh the proven benefits, then you might be clueless.

If you believe our allegiance should be with murderous, repressive dictatorships instead of democratic, human rights-supporting allies, then you might be clueless.

If you believe it is OK for anyone over the age of seven to still be calling other people names, then you might be clueless.

If you believe the only people who should have access to quality health care are those who can afford it, then you might be clueless.

If you believe a woman's place is in the home, then you might be clueless.

If you believe your generation is superior to the generations that came after it, then you might be clueless.

If you believe economic advantages trump moral imperatives, then you might be clueless.

If you believe your success in life is due primarily to your own efforts, then you might be clueless.

If you believe your uneducated, ignorant views are equal to others' enlightened, informed opinions, then you might be clueless.

Finally, if you believe God has provided you insights into reality that He somehow spared everyone else, then you might be clueless.
