

As an American, I have many beliefs

I am an American.

I believe in freedom of religion. And by "religion," I obviously mean "Christian." Everyone else should go back to wherever they came from if they want their own freedom of religion.

I believe I should have access to the best health care system in the world regardless of my lifestyle or personal choices – and that I shouldn't have to pay for it.

I believe my kids should attend public schools that are second to none and that teachers should volunteer their services to make sure they stay that way.

I believe we should continue to subsidize industries that produce goods or provide services that are no longer needed or kill people.

I believe discrimination is a myth created by people who should just work harder.

I believe I am solely responsible for my success in life. As a white, middle-class male who grew up never wanting for anything, I was still able to overcome these tremendous disadvantages and make it completely on my own.

I believe I should be able to retire at 50 and draw twice as much as I earned while I was working.

I believe Wall Street cares deeply about the problems on Main Street and is working 24/7 to create jobs and make the world a better place for everyone.

I believe the rich should continue to do everything they can to acquire even more wealth and the middle class should make it their mission to help them as much as possible.

I believe we have a God-given mandate to help when our neighbors are in need – as long as it doesn't impact our own well-being or require any real sacrifice.

I believe you should be able to get something for nothing and expenditures can exceed revenues forever.

I am an American.
