

Questions help label political persuasions

Are you a liberal or a conservative?

Many readers undoubtedly wonder where they fall on the political spectrum. This being the case, I thought it might be useful to provide a quick way to tell which camp you belong to; for guidance with this task, I decided to use the approach pioneered some years ago by Jeff Foxworthy.

So answer these questions to find out which label best suits you.

If you believe access to the best health care is a right, you might be a liberal.

But if you believe access to any health care is a privilege, you might be a conservative.

If you are pro-choice when it comes to abortion, you might be a liberal.

However, if you are pro-choice when it comes to education, you might be a conservative.

If you believe owning a slingshot should require a license, you might be a liberal.

But if you believe automatic weapons should be available in vending machines, you might be a conservative.

If you believe we need to install land mines along our Southern border, you might be a conservative.

Then again, if you believe we should just put up a big "Welcome" sign, you might be a liberal.

If you believe in taking your ball and going home if you don't get your way, you might be a conservative.

But if you believe balls should be distributed free of charge to everyone, you might be a liberal.

If you believe disaster relief should be provided primarily by charitable organizations, you might be a conservative.

Although if you believe in continuing to assist people who repeatedly rebuild in harm's way, you might be a liberal.

Finally, if you believe people who hold extremist views, whether liberal or conservative, are the real problem, you might be right.
